Me and I

A photographic exploration of one woman's relationship with Judaism.

I grew up in Arizona in a reform Jewish household in a Reform Jewish community. I attended a Reform synagogue, and learned how to be a Reform Jew. While I was taught the customs and traditions of other sects of Judaism, I rarely ever got to see them for myself in this liberal context.

When I moved across the country to Boston, I was surprised to find the lack of a strong Reform Jewish community. My research showed me that there were only two synagogues in the area with Reform services, and that they were held only occasionally, in a part of the city that would have been difficult for me to get to on my own. So I joined the Orthodox and Conservative Jews on my small college campus, and began going to Orthodox services at Chabad.

For the first time ever, I was at a service where men and women could not sit together. Women could not read from the Torah, or lead in prayer. Unmarried men and women do not touch each other. I observed how different the Jewish culture at Chabad is from the culture I grew up in. All of the lessons I had learned at synagogue suddenly became real. Despite all the differences in this community, it is still a community, and it very quickly became my own community.

About Me

My name is Karen Judin and I am an aspiring photojournalist. I am a third-year candidate for a Bachelor of Fine Arts in Photography at Lesley University College of Art and Design in Cambridge, Massachusetts. I was born and raised in Tucson, Arizona, and throughout my childhood often found myself inspired by the incredible landscapes that were seen daily. I combined this love of nature with my love of art, and early in my life discovered my love for photography. Not only do I love to photograph landscapes, but people in their natural setting. I hope to travel across the globe learning about many different cultures and lifestyles, and making it possible for others to gain awareness.
